

Brunetieres Essays in French Literature (Classic Reprint)

The few essays, selected from many others to form the present volume, have this in common, that all aim more or less at the determination of the essential character of French literature. I use this word in the sense it bears in natural history, and the essential character of a literature is that which separates it or distinguishes it from all other literatures. In truth, a great literature, such as the French or the English, so old, so rich, so diverse, and with each successive epoch showing such differences, cannot well accept a single formula and allow itself to be imprisoned, as it were, within its narrow bounds.
