Not illustrated. 1767 Excerpt: ...be its own reward, and he would own that if he went to the proper market, happiness was to be purchased at a very reasonable price: In short, if mankind would consider that virtue and vice create their own heaven and hell even on this side the grave, the principal part of us would endeavour to act in such a manner as would enable them to look with confidence beyond it, and experience in this world some tollerable idea of that selicity which is prepared to await the righteous in the next j Numb. XCII. Saturday October 30. I HAVE often remarked that one half of the pleasures so eagerly prosecuted by the generality of mankind, if changed in their appellations, and ranked under the denomination; of labour, would be shunned with as much assiduity as they arc now followed, and rendered every whit as disgustsul to the fancy as they are now flattering and agreeable. Through some unaccountable infatuation we are ravished in the literary sense of the expression, with the whistling of a name, and infinitely fatigue ourselves more in the barepursuit of our several amusements, than in the closest attention to the duties of our respective vocations, though these evocations are the only means which we have of raising a necessary provision for our families. The truth of this position was never more evidently ascertained than in the character of poor Bob Beetle. Bob is engaged in a very extensive way of business; and is, at once, the most laay and the most industrious sellow alive: he is fatigued to death if he writes a few lines to a correspondent, but he will ride after a pack of dogs for a dozen hours together, and call it glorious sport, when he has ventured his neck over a score or two of gates, and
